Peter Andre is said to be livid over the latest row with ex-wife Jordan

Pete wants the children to spend more time with him

Harvey burned his leg on New Year's Eve 2006

recorded by cameras that were filming for Peter's reality show. A spokesman for Jordan responded by saying: "She became aware that she was being recorded, which upset her in these circumstances. Of course she doesn't really wish Peter any physical harm - but she feels it's time he stopped constantly slagging her off and consider how that might impact on their children."

However, Peter's new girlfriend, Elen Rivas, has no doubts about his parenting skills, telling friends, "He's the perfect dad." Another friend said that Elen is "stunned and shocked" by how Jordan attacks Peter in public, and that mum-of-two Elen, "really wants it to stop".

Meanwhile, leading family lawyer Rodney Hylton-Potts told new! Peter and Jordan should deal with things in private in future. "Accidents are unfortunate, but all parents make mistakes," he said. "Each is entitled to say that, in their opinion, the other is not a good parent. What they shouldn't do is make it public."

Mr Hylton-Potts also pointed out that it could be damaging for the children. "Parents have spats all the time, but to have them on social-networking sites is inappropriate - the children will be able to read it in the future. Once these things are in the public domain, they're there forever."

Meanwhile, relationship expert Mo Shapiro added, "I suggest that they sit down with a mediator to discuss it because I don't think they can do it on their own. The person would have to be a professional, somebody objective. They need to stop and think about what they're trying to achieve and how they can achieve it in a positive way."

Pete currently shares custody of Princess and Junior, five. But the pop singer is so upset by the recent row that he reportedly wants to ask his lawyers about increasing the amount of time the children are allowed to spend with him.

"He's so serious about this that he's vowed that if Jordan doesn't give him what he wants, he'll see her in court," the source said.

And it seems feisty Jordan - who flaunted her pins in a pair of leopard-print boots on a night out in London last Thursday - is ready to dig her heels in, too. A source close to the star said, "She'll happily see him in the courtroom."

Jordan and Pete split in 2009 after four years of marriage. They have been at loggerheads over the kids since November, when Jordan announced she wanted to withdraw them from the public eye, and criticised Pete for keeping them on his ITV2 show.

to contact Kate urgently to find out what had happened, but she didn't respond at all."

However, Jordan told new! that it was "an accident of the type that happens to children all the time".

Then, at the weekend it was reported that when Peter finally got to speak to his ex-wife about their daughter's burn, Jordan told Peter she wanted him dead. She allegedly said: "Look Pete, you've destroyed my life, you've made me completely unhappy. I honestly wish you would get in your car, drive as fast as you can and have a crash and die!"
